Cullen Dale, a wealthy and sport-loving young man, loved Marian Westover, a very womanly young woman. Harvey Gilroy, Dale's best friend, loved her too, but was too good a pal to even let her know the fact. And when in a hard fought polo game wherein Dale and Gilroy are captains of the opposing teams, their ponies come together and all go down in a heap, the true friendship of the two men is exhibited in their mutual solicitude. Cullen proposes to, and is accepted by Marian. She promises not to be jealous, but becomes so immediately on seeing some old photographs showing him with various company--the company being pretty girls in each case.

There comes to the Dale home to see his sister - but really to see him - Jessica Ramsey, a typically outdoor girl who has set her cap for Cullen. And Marian again becomes jealous--for had not Cullen just told her that Jess was in Africa. He had lied! Really he had 'nt--in this instance. The war was on. The lively Jess had the best of it when it came to outdoor sports, over Marian who preferred teas and things. And Harvey Gilroy, still the self-sacrificing true friend tried his best to knock a corner off the triangle and help Marian and Cullen to happiness which he must himself miss. Marian tried hard to emulate golfing , tennis playing and riding of Jess Gilroy trying to prevent the latter from spoiling the two some, but she broke through his guard and finally came the show down.

A wonderfully furnished lodge in the mountains, belonging to Jess, was the scene. To it she invited Marian and Cullen knowing that the former would'nt come. There was a row between she and Cullen and a break--he got his ring back and went to the lodge where Jess and her dear old grandmother.

But a storm cut off supplies, Cullen began to tire of Jess. He realized also her purpose and began to feel a bit of dislike. Then came Gilroy and Marian with provisions and the war began again but with positions reversed. Now Marian had the best of it. Cullen was already wearying of Jess and Marian was lovely and dainty. And finally Jess threw off the trammels of civilization and claimed Cullen--a silly thing to do because she hadn't apprised him that he was hers. And she lost and Marian won and Gilroy tried to be happy, self-sacrificing, good pal that he was. And it all ended happily - except for the defested Jessica.
